Very rarely they may be disseminated over the whole body. They rupture and heal much as do those in the mouth. Secondary infection of the ulcers on the toes or fingers may lead to loss of the nails. In severe cases petechiae have been described. In children, and less often in adults, there may be more serious general symptoms, with chills, high fever, colicky abdominal pain, nausea, vomiting and diarrhea with bloody stools. Such cases may end fatally, as may those in which serious secondary infections occur. During a severe epidemic near Berlin, reported by Siegel, out of a population of 9, 000 it was estimated that two-thirds contracted the disease during a period of three years. There were 36 deaths attributed to the infection, 15...
